WORKING PAPER

Gender-based violence in schools and girls' education: Experimental evidence from Mozambique

(joint with Sofia Amaral, Aixa Garcia-Ramos, Selim Gulesci, Alejandra Ramos, and Micaela Sviatschi)

Gender-based violence (GBV) at schools is a pervasive problem that affects millions of adolescent girls worldwide. In partnership with the Ministry of Education in Mozambique, we developed an intervention to increase the capacity of key school personnel to address GBV and to improve students' awareness as well as proactive behaviors. To understand the role of GBV on girls' education, we randomized not only exposure to the intervention but also whether the student component was targeted to girls only, boys only, or both. Our findings indicate a reduction in sexual violence by teachers and school staff against girls, regardless of the targeted gender group, providing evidence of the role of improving the capacity of key school personnel to deter perpetrators.

Incentives, Management, and Public Service Delivery: Evidence from a large field experiment in Peru

Governments often struggle to improve service quality when critical dimensions of effort are difficult to observe. This paper examines whether incentive design can address this challenge by strengthening management practices. I study two institutional incentive schemes applied to a municipal service delivery intervention aimed at reducing childhood anemia in Peru: a standard input-based contract and a mixed incentive contract conditioning rewards on both inputs and outcomes. Leveraging a clustered randomized controlled trial across 539 rural municipalities, I find that municipalities assigned to the mixed contract increased managerial intensity — strengthening monitoring, coordinating more actively with health facilities, and motivating frontline workers — leading to higher utilization of preventive health services and iron supplementation. Despite these improvements, the intervention did not generate short-run reductions in childhood anemia.

Spillover Effects of School Infrastructure Upgrade: Evidence from Peru

(joint with Fabiola Alba-Vivar)

This paper examines a school infrastructure upgrading program and its direct and indirect impacts on enrollment, school dropout rates, and student achievement. We exploit the program's rollout over four years before an abrupt redesign left some schools without the upgrade. Our findings suggest that schools receiving the upgrades experienced a 0.58 percentage point reduction in dropout rates. However, we observe spillover effects on nearby schools: an increase in private school closures and a decline in enrollment, predominantly affecting the public sector. Notably, reading test scores in nearby private and public schools also dropped, suggesting that the students leaving these schools were likely those with higher human capital.
